

EDITORIAL

It is with great pleasure we present to you the first case report supplement for the Journal of the College of Surgeons of Sri Lanka. This is a first in its history and is produced due to necessity as the number of good quality and interesting submissions have exceeded our normal quota.

Case reports provide us a glimpse into the 'weird and sometimes the not so wonderful' that we encounter in surgical pathology and practice. These add interest to our surgical practice and writing a case report enables junior medical staff to commence their first steps to climb to a publication platform.

We would like to encourage more and more submissions to the journal and would like to thank all the authors for submitting these interesting cases.
